Excerpt: . . . respect, or the other way Investigation Needed Now, gentlemen, I have this proposal to make. I do not put it in the form of a motion, simply in the form of a suggestion: Before seriously attempting to correct delays in the law, we have got to know what those delays are. All us lawyers have some pretty definite notion, but still if I were to ask any lawyer here what is the average time between the filing of a complaint and getting the case to issue, he would have a hard time telling you. These facts can be easily ascertained, and I make this proposal as worthy of this Club: That we employ somebody to take, well, say the last two volumes of the Supreme Court decisions and the last two volumes of the District Court of Appeals and arrange a chronology of the cases there contained, finding out first when the complaints in those cases were filed, second, when they got to issue, and third, when the judgment was rendered; fourth, when notice of appeal was given; fifth, when the transcript was filed, and sixth, when the case was decided. That tabulation would be of great value for determining the delays and where they occur and at what point we must strike particularly. That is worth doing. The next proposition is to simplify our procedure. We have only touched the surface in this report. But procedure was intended as a means of expediting...
