Not illustrated. 1815 Excerpt: . . . his vows of everlasting friendship. forgotten, Eliza! Buried in the grave of lady Danvilles arms. That he loves her, is duty, is justice; I commend him for it; but to treat me with disdain, is cruelty, is perfidy to friendship and his reverend tutors memory. My God! Eliza--is it possible--yes, I have lived for Davenent to despise me. Do you not wonder how I could write on the preceding trifles, when this, to me, heartrending intelligence was untold I thought, my dear Eliza, to conceal it from you, that you might not share my grief. Alas! my soul in agonies extreme was bursting to vent itself on paper to you, since I cannot personally sigh over my woe. The benevolent, humane, and tender lord Sedley, beheld me with scorn. My heart almost dies within me at the torturing reminiscence. Had any conduct of mine, since we parted, given him cause to condemn me, any opportunity for malevolent censure, it would be excusable. But Miss Barlowes fortune and character makes her respectable, and being her companion nobody can censure me for it. VOL. I. M It must be Lady Sedleys malignant insinuations that has made him treat me so contemptuously--She triumphs, and I am wretched. I wronged Lady Sedley; the cause of Davenents conduct, is no longer an enigma--let me proceed methodically. Mrs. Henley came to breakfast in her riding habit, saying, she was going out of town, to pass a few days, and on her return...
